

DAZZLING IN COLOR; RECKLESS IN DESIGN; FALL HATS ARE HERE

Stamp of Extravagant Directoire Period Impressed on Autumn Headgear—Some Striking Effects Produced by High Priced Veils.

Salt Lake shops looked yesterday as if times were prosperous in this part of the country, if nowhere else. Although only one or two formal millinery openings were in progress, the crowds were out on their semi-annual tour to view the wonders in headgear.

And the wonders of headgear are surely to be seen. Each season brings its own gorgeousness apparently, but certain it is that never has an autumn season presented such a riot of color and such richness of material as does this. Of course the extravagance of the Directoire period, when Louis XIV. and his court launched forth in splendor unheard of before, dominates all things, and the season just opening may be said to be a Directoire season in every sense.

The gowns are of course of the modified Directoire kind—that is, with all the effect except the convenient side opening for greater ease in walking. Perhaps the carriage habit has done away with its convenience; perhaps society is not yet ready for it; but, however, that may be, there will be no special run on the ultra garment of the period in Salt Lake.

Perfect Dreams Again.

But the hats to wear with the Directoire gowns are "perfect dreams." They are of all styles, but all bear the unmistakable stamp of the extravagant period. Ranging in size from the very small to the very large, in material from the heavy silks and broadens to the lighter lace styles, they may be said to suit everyone—unless it may be in the matter of price.

A Madame Louise hat is of a certain heliotrope shade bordering on the vieux rose. It is an immense affair of heavy corded silk, and is made in a poke style with two decided tabs coming down toward the ears, over which an enchanting bit of lace forms a veil. The lace is a light blue, large enough for a Spanish mantilla, is draped over this immense creation, and bunches of great black feathers are caught on the one side.

There would seem to be no limit to the size of the hats, for one great affair of heavy black silk measures about 24 1/2 inches, and it is not a Merry Widow, by the way. It drops in a fetching way hither and yon, and holds a great bunch of plumes in place at one side by means of a Directoire buckle of huge proportions which reaches across the front of it.

Shaped Like a Mushroom.

The Nell Brinkley drawings have left their imprint on the fashion plates in the form of a mushroom-shaped thing with all its quantities of trimming at the back. Great feathery aigrettes with the curling fronds shown in the Brinkley drawings are at the extreme rear and fall far down below the shoulders.

A real Directoire poke in black and white is cut in an inverted V at the back to admit of the fashionable Psyche knot of hair, and this is allowed to tie under the chin (which must be round and shapely) with fetching streamers that fall the length of the gown. Great bunches of white willow plumes fall at one side, and the ubiquitous Directoire buckle is in place in the front.

Still in the black and whites comes an Ada Rehan hat wound around the crown with a cloth of gold scarf to relieve the deep black of the velvet. The scarf is just about forty inches in length falls from the hat nearly to the waist.

Although all styles admit of the term Directoire, there are some so distinctively of the period that they are called simply Directoire hats. One of these, in black and white corded silk, has an immense crown, and a rolling brim which turns to an extreme height on one side. Here again ostrich feathers, richer and heavier than ever seen before, form the main trimming.

Creations in Veils.

But of all the unique fads brought in by the season in headgear (or should one say face gear?) the new veils for the winter are decidedly in a class by themselves. They are of black—almost any color in a hat will admit of the black veil—in fine net, and they are made on the old-fashioned order of the ancient lambrequin which once surrounded the beds of monarchs. A string of artistic quality holds the veil in place under the hat, and thence it descends in heavy gathers to the region of the throat, where it is gathered in a circle by means of an encircling band. Of course for such an unusual occupation as eating or drinking one must lower the entire arrangement.

UNIVERSITY NOTES.

The University Chronicle started out another year yesterday with a bright, breezy issue. The Chronicle is under the editorship of Deil Judd. Instead of appearing twice a month as a literary periodical, it is now in the form of a weekly news sheet containing the news of the school and the important events in the college world.

The freshmen boys are preparing for the annual flag rush, which will come off within the next few weeks. The sophomores select their dates, and the freshmen are determined that they will not be caught off their guard and have already effected a temporary organization with Dex Bennion as temporary chairman.

Assistant Coach E. J. Milne, who has charge of the gymnasium classes at the university, announces that the classes will start Friday afternoon. The gymnasium classes will be larger than ever this year, and special attention will be given to this work. Physical education is compulsory with freshmen boys.

Squire Coop, professor of music, has announced two new courses to be given this year—the history of music, and harmony. These courses are open to all students and college credit will be given for them. A special teachers' course will also be given. This is designed to equip the student for musical instruction in the public schools.

Professor Maund May Babcock is already preparing plans for the dramatic season. She has selected Shakespeare's "As You Like It" to be presented by the students at their annual engagement. Miss Babcock says that in addition to an excellent cast she will have a good male chorus and dancers for the wedding scene.

ment, and allow it to fall gracefully as may be around the shoulders. The entrance, as it were, is by the back only in most cases, though an improvement has been tried by having the heavy hangings open in front, in which case the gathers would of course be fuller than ever.

These veils, which are styled "creations," come at the modest price of $5 to $10, and add a trifle to the cost of the winter hat. A skillful dresser may be able to concoct one for a few cents less, but, what with the ruche and all the trimmings, the cost must necessarily be considerable.

Colors of the Rainbow.

But if black is having a reign, colors are having a riot. Every color in the rainbow, varied and improved by all the wiles of art, will be seen, and, as usual, the most daring and startling combinations will be in the matter of hats. Some of the new shades are catwaba, wistaria, vieux rose, jade green, taupe (known by the unsavory name of London smoke), poan blue, canard or peacock blue, Napoleon buff and many others.

In the Napoleon buff some very attractive hats are to be seen. One on the order of the walking hat, but larger in proportion as all hats are larger, is of silk of the buff, faced with heavy black satin. Encircling its crown is a loose band of black silk, and this is fastened directly in front with a huge Directoire buckle. In the top of this is a handsome miniature set around with rhinestones, while from the one side rises a great willow plume in the buff, shading into a rich golden yellow. A decided roll on one side gives jauntiness to the whole.

The same color, verging on a shade of copper, is seen in many of the season's hats. One model is of this color in a large flat hat of the style which is always good. It, too, is faced with black, and the only trimmings seen are four immense pompoms of ostrich feathers, with a great Directoire wing at one side of the buff feathers topped by the pheasant plume.

A sailor hat of this shade in Ottoman silk is perfectly flat except for a low bowl-shaped crown from which arise two of the fashionable natural ostrich feathers stripped of their hideousness by some artificial touches of black.

Sailors Hardly Recognized.

Sailors would hardly be recognized at all under their old name, but the name seems to be one of the kind that must be attached to something in headgear every season. One new style is turned up at the back—but the back comes low on the neck that unless one is told of this fact one wouldn't notice it.

The fancy veils with their rich neck garniture have given rise to still another style, which is the ruche attached to the hat with no visible connecting link. A tiny strip of velvet at the back, which is literally lost in a maze of hair, has at its end a bewitching fluffiness to surround the throat and add roundness and charm to a chin already charming. But let her whose chin is too evident, or whose chin has lost its rounded outline, beware of this ruche. It is a snare and a delusion.

For street wear, or what one might call practical wear, the hats are in a variety of styles. Turbans of the boat-shaped order, smart-looking toques of various shapes, and felt hats with the favorite Pochantas feathers—standing straight up or curved down around, but always suggestive of the Indian headdress—are much in evidence. Large flat hats with the brim slightly larger in front than at the back, laden with coque feathers or some such serviceable plumage, bid fair to be favorites, and drooping hats wider than they are long will hold sway for at least the early part of the winter.

ROWLAND HALL OPENS.

Registration Reaches 150, Which is Capacity of School.

Rowland Hall will open its twenty-ninth year this morning with the usual early morning service at 7:30. Dean Benjamin Brewster will conduct this service, and also make a brief address to the girls, as will Rev. C. E. Perkins.

The past two days have been spent in registering pupils. The capacity of the school is 150, but this mark has been passed, so the registration will be between 150 and 160.

Four new teachers have been added to the faculty. Miss Margaret Curtis, a graduate of Smith and a post-graduate of the University of Utah, will be in charge of the English department.

Early morning raids on the hobo camps along the Rio Grande Western tracks have resulted in ridding the city of many undesirable citizens. In the raid made Tuesday morning but two "vags" were found, as against thirty on the morning before. The two found yesterday were given an opportunity to get out of town. Not a man charged with vagrancy was before Judge Diehl Tuesday afternoon.

M. H. Redding, charged with battery, was found guilty and fined $10. He was accused of beating up H. Redeker, a milkman.

Paddy Ryan, the cause of much trouble in Roberts court, was found guilty of disturbing the peace and fined $10. He did not have the ten and will remain in the city jail for that number of days.
